“It is our duty to prepare our hearts and fix our thoughts for every religious service to which we are called – and it is our sin when we are careless about it. But we must not attempt this work in our own strength. In everything we must direct our eyes to God, the fountain of all goodness, praying to Him, as David did for his people, that He may prepare our hearts unto Himself.”

George Lawson, 1821

Matthew Henry's Commentary on today's text, 1 Corinthians 12:12-31

God has tempered the members of the body natural in the manner mentioned, that there might be no schism in the body, no rupture nor disunion among the members, nor so much as the least mutual disregard. This should be avoided also in the spiritual body of Christ. There should be no schism in this body, but the members should be closely united by the strongest bonds of love. All decays of this affection are the seeds of schism. Where Christians grow cold towards each other, they will be careless and unconcerned for each other. And this mutual disregard is a schism begun. The members of the natural body are made to have a care and concern for each other, to prevent a schism in it. So should it be in Christ's body; the members should sympathize with each other. As in the natural body the pain of the one part afflicts the whole, the ease and pleasure of one part affects the whole, so should Christians reckon themselves honoured in the honours of their fellow-christians, and should suffer in their sufferings. Note, Christian sympathy is a great branch of Christian duty. We should be so far from slighting our brethren's sufferings that we should suffer with them, so far from envying their honours that we should rejoice with them and reckon ourselves honoured in them.
