A Christian's hope is not in this life; then he would have forlorn hope. There is nothing here to be hoped for but vicissitudes. All the world rings changes—but we are looking for that blessed hope. This is the difference between the seaman's anchor and the believer's anchor. The seaman casts his anchor downwards; the believer casts his anchor upwards in heaven, looking for that blessed hope.

Psalm 126

For the next two Sundays we will be taking a break in our study through the book of Romans, with today's sermon coming from Psalm 126. Henry Law (1797-1884) penned the below words in relation to verses 5-6, which offers great encouragement as we transition into a new year, with new opportunities:

An image from rustic life gives comfort. The husbandman in hopeful toil casts the seed into the furrows. Months pass and there is no sign of life. In due season spring returns. The fields again are clad with verdure. Summer glows with ripening rays. The harvest is gathered in amid full shouts of joy. So a long period of dreary waiting may depress the soul; but the promised deliverance comes, and sorrow flees in shouts of fervent joy. May this be speedily our glad experience.
